Read the following passage and mark the letter A, B, C, or D on your answer sheet to indicate the correct option to each of the following questions.

Throughout history, shopping has always played an important role in daily life, as it is closely connected with people's everyday needs.

In the past, people often went shopping at traditional markets and fairs. At these places, shoppers could bargain with sellers and buy goods such as home-grown vegetables or home-made food at reasonable prices. Many people enjoyed going to open-air markets not only to shop but also to wander around, meet others, and hang out with friends in a friendly outdoor atmosphere.

Today, shopping habits have changed as cities have developed. Supermarkets, shopping centres, convenience stores, and speciality shops are becoming more popular because they are convenient and easy to access. In these modern shopping places, goods are clearly displayed with price tags and most items have fixed prices. Customers can easily find different items and a wide range of products in one place. During sales, many goods are on sale with attractive discounts, which attracts a large number of buyers.

In general, both traditional markets and modern shopping places play an important role in people's lives. Traditional markets are valued for their social and outdoor experience, while modern shops are known for their convenience and clear prices. Each type of shopping place has its own value.

(Adapted from The Economist)
